

Prevention can save children

WHILE it was reported that "the death of a toddler fatally bashed at her father's house in 2009 could not be prevented" (The Age, 20/10), the coroner's finding speaks to something quite different, and telling: "It is essential that investment therefore be made in programs designed to engage and assist families prior to serious problems emerging and before particular patterns of behaviour become entrenched."

Removing children from the risk of violence is only part of the solution. We need to be working with fathers in an effort to stop the violence. While interventions theoretically exist, the system is overloaded to a point of implosion. Victoria's 37 men's behaviour change programs are drowning in demand for service. Without critical increases in resources, men are regularly being turned away. Investment is needed now for the future of our children and community.

Danny Blay, No To Violence and the Men's Referral Service, Melbourne

Prevention can save children

WHILE it was reported that "the death of a toddler fatally bashed at her father's house in 2009 could not be prevented" (The Age, 20/10), the coroner's finding speaks to something quite different, and telling: "It is essential that investment therefore be made in programs designed to engage and assist families prior to serious problems emerging and before particular patterns of behaviour become entrenched."

Removing children from the risk of violence is only part of the solution. We need to be working with fathers in an effort to stop the violence. While interventions theoretically exist, the system is overloaded to a point of implosion. Victoria's 37 men's behaviour change programs are drowning in demand for service. Without critical increases in resources, men are regularly being turned away. Investment is needed now for the future of our children and community.

Danny Blay, No To Violence and the Men's Referral Service, Melbourne